The Lego Masterpiece Makers met for the first time Monday at South Broken Arrow Library. Using Legos provided by a generous grant from the Hardesty Family Foundation the children, ages 5 to 12, got to work.

The home-schooled children could choose to only attend once or return again Friday, Nov. 13 and Thursday, Nov. 19, 1 to 2:30 p.m.

Annalee Wall, 5, obviously a forward-thinking and practical child, was working on a castle with a potty.

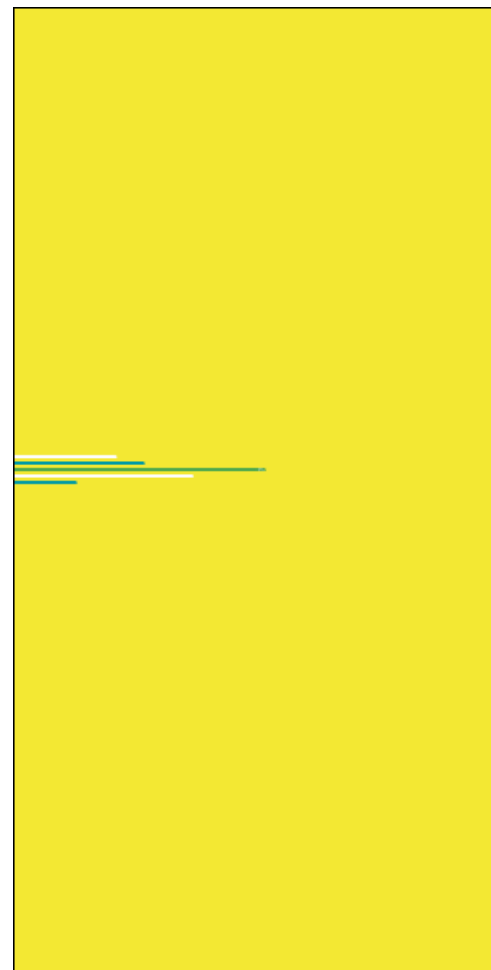

Rachel Bauer, 5, was building a tall building to hold animals and treasures.

Ashley Rich, 4 1/2, was going to limit her architecture to building ice cream cones, but when the Ledger stopped by her table later, she had quite a structure going, perhaps a whole Braum's in the making.

London Rich, 5, said she was working on "possibly a zoo."

Bella Rich, 9, and her bestie Raegan Reeves,10, were building a house complete with construction workers doing the building. The Planned Unit Development

(PUD) appeared to be calling for a good-sized driveway.

Gaige Queen, 5, working from the floor, said he was building "something cool."

His mother added, "He loves Legos!"

Nikolaus Penka with help from his friend Patrick Looney was building an entire story which involved knights, royalty and hiding the gold -- right beneath the throne on which the king sat. An architect and military commander would do a better job of explaining the whole battle plan than the Ledger just has.

Grant Wall sat on the carpet with his son Benjamin Wall, and in progress was a fantastic pirate hide out.

Asher Grossi was building a castle, starting first with a trap to catch people trying to sneak in. Ava Grossi was planning to build a castle or a church. Perhaps it would become both with prayerful royalty.
